

So, despite the fact that fisheries do have an ultimate productive limit, we are currently at some distance from that point. All that is needed is more effective management targeting economically optimal stock levels. But its role in remote and rural areas can be very important in terms of jobs and economic activity such as in Japan, Canada and Norway. Outside of the OECD, it is an important source of nutrition and employment, especially in coastal areas of developing States and territories